Characteristics and Contexts

Spelling in the same speech community. Oratorical speech tends to be interpreted in light of the larger ongoing drama of the society, and the social event in which it is performed.

Performance can also help establish a particular atmosphere that the orator is trying to create. This can be done through the use of language and tone, gesture and body language, all of which can also influence the audience's reception of the speech. The orator's position on the podium, the presence of others, and the physical environment in which the speech is delivered can all affect the audience's reception of the speech.

The art of public speaking is often measured by the audience's reaction. However, the orator's reaction to the audience's reaction is equally important. The orator's ability to adapt to the audience's reaction and to use it to shape the speech can often be as important as the content of the speech itself.

Western tradition of speech and Roman rhetoric are strongly associated with public speaking in political and legal settings, and it is through the art of rhetoric that the audience is persuaded to act. However, the art of rhetoric can also be found in everyday life, and the ability to use it effectively can often be the difference between success and failure.
Speeches is also quite common in other uses of language. In some cases, the speakers are concerned with the question of whether or not the speech is well-structured and coherent. The structure of the speech is usually clear and easy to follow. However, there are cases where the speech is not well-structured and is difficult to follow. In these cases, the speakers may rely on visual aids or other non-verbal cues to help the audience understand the content of the speech.

The role of the audience is also significant in the effectiveness of the speech. The audience is expected to pay attention to the speaker and to understand the message being conveyed. The audience may also ask questions or provide feedback to the speaker. The effectiveness of the speech is determined by the audience's level of understanding and engagement with the message.

Overall, the effectiveness of a speech depends on a combination of factors, including the structure of the speech, the clarity of the message, and the level of engagement of the audience. By paying attention to these factors, speakers can improve the effectiveness of their speeches and ensure that their messages are understood and remembered by the audience.
Language and Song

Performance

There are many different kinds of audience for music performance, but music performance as a form of communication is unique in the sense that it is not bound by the constraints of language. Music can take place without words, and even when words are used, they are often not intended to be audible. Nevertheless, music and its performance are a form of communication, a way for people to express themselves and connect with others. The performer, whether a singer or a musician, is able to convey emotions and ideas through their musical expression.
