Mr. Ball turned to Germany and asked how the consultative procedures were developing under the January 23 treaty.

Mr. Tyler said that he was struck by the way in which Chancellor Aleskov had been indulging himself in recent days in speaking of his letter to Khrushchev, referring to any detente as pernicious, criticizing wheat sales to Russia, and calling for the resignation of Macmillan. He thought that Aleskov was playing into the hands of Soviet propaganda. It is quite regrettable that by taking this posture Aleskov is giving the Germans to the Soviet charge that they are responsible to the world, all of which does not help the West in general, and Germany, in particular. He said that there is no choice in this matter and that we are all in it together.

Ambassador Bohlen asked whether the French had earlier heard about the Adenauer proposal to Khrushchev for a ten-year political truce. /

Mr. Hall said that we are concerned about a revival of the inter-war German psychosis that they are being discriminated against. When the French nuclear force is tangible and in being, the German sense of being left out might become acute. We are trying to provide a political answer to this problem through the M.F. /

Mr. Hall said that the U.S. recognizes as does France that there is no political basis in Europe now to decide on the question of federalism, and that we are both saying the same things in different ways. The U.S. recognizes this is not an overnight affair. We have always contemplated that the M.F. might become a strictly European force at some point in time. Ambassador Bohlen noted that there is no contradiction between the French concept and the M.F. /
